As a fellow clinician who likewise focuses on screen time's impact on mental health and brain development, I'm an easy sell on this topic. But I have found myself re-reading and contemplating certain sections of this book. For example, Dr Freed talks about how, through social media, texting, secret virtual lives, and constantly being plugged in, teens are detaching from their families and making their peer group their "family" much earlier now. What intimate details parents used to know about their teens' daily lives are now unknown to most parents but readily available to their kids' friends. Meanwhile, parents are often clueless about what the child's really doing, and believe they'll make the child a social outcast by not allowing the child a smartphone. But what happens inadvertently is the parent then can't protect--or know--the child in the same way anymore. Eventually, the child often stops respecting the parent because they see them as incompetent. What struck me about this was this: here else does kind of dynamic occur? Street gangs--or rather, the process of joining and becoming part of a gang. Kids who are neglected are ripe to join gangs because they get a sense of belonging as well as a sense of identity. The gang replaces the family, and becomes a driving force of behavior. I work with parents of teens every day, and they are extremely conflicted about taking screens away, even when I explain how screens might be impacting their teen's mood, attention, sleep, or behavior. And it is not just extreme cases where kids are being exposed to things like cutting, porn, sexting, gambling, or violence, or are visiting sites that encourage unhealthy ideas or actions. It happens all the time; all too often innocence is lost and the family unit is fractured.
