What do Khan Academy, the GoPro camera, the Dyson vacuum cleaner and Kickstarter have in common? Customer Reviews

I first learned about Bernadette Jiwaâ™s work from Seth Godin. He referenced her TedX Perth speech in a blog post a few years ago when she spoke about The Secret to Spreading Ideas. I have been captivated by her writing and ideas since that first encounter. Bernadetteâ™s new book, Meaningful, The Story of Ideas that Fly continues the themes and insights about marketing. The book provides a helpful frame of reference for understanding how and where marketing fits into a brandâ™s journey and the customerâ™s needs. When we start with an empathic and compassionate view of those we want to serve, the product path becomes clearer. Marketing is not something we do to a product or service. Marketing starts by having a deep understanding of a customerâ™s story and then trying to find how you can help support them in their quest for a solution. Waiting endlessly for a cab to show up was a common problem. Worrying about paying for the cab. Concern that the cab won't be clean. But it took Uber to recognize that if they could tell you where the car was and when it would arrive, make paying easy ---it might help you manage the uncertainty and solve a problem seamlessly.âœEvery business that flies starts not with the best idea, the biggest budget or better marketing, but with the story of someone who want to do something, and canâ™t. We donâ™t change the world by starting with our brilliant ideas, our dreams: we change the world by helping others live their dreams.â • B.Jiwa Meaningful has many examples of businesses that started by understanding a problem before they created a product or service. You can learn about Shoes of Prey, Appbot, Black Milk Clothing, Canva, Flow Hive, Go Pro, Little Flowers, Khan Academy, Harryâ€™s and Nike Flyease.
